Happy at Seventy.

Rear Admiral Schley, who has just celebrated his 70th birthday, is well, feels young and is happy. "There is sunshine without and within," he said, touching his breast. "I am not as good, of course, in some respects," he went on, "as I was at 25, but in others perhaps I am a whole lot better."

It is a pleasant picture which he presents, for excepting happy youth, there is no more attractive thing in life than happy and contented age. The joy of the young is an instinctive thing, the thoughtless delight in the world around which to them is made anew for them to conquer; it is sheer physical pleasure in living. When the old are glad and still have a zest of life, it means that they have passed the trials and tribulations from which no one is exempt, and have risen above depressing influences; it means that they have been taught wisdom by discipline and experience, and have learned to look on existence with a cheerful philosophy; it means that they have found much in life besides care and anxiety and that it is worth living to the end.

The cheerfulness of old age is a demonstration of faith, conscious or not, in a higher wisdom, a proof of sweetness of soul and of bygone years well spent. To be happy at 70 and glad to be alive is to be an inspiration and delight to the middle-aged who bear the burdens and have not yet learned that "the best is yet to be," and that a peaceful age is the crown of life. —Indianapolis Star.
